Totto Hand I . COMMUNICATED. HONOR-By J. B. Johnson.

Honor has its origin in the teaching of virtue; and is kent in existence by the relation of life-interest which all men bear to the world. It is so much expected in the conduct of mankind, that it is said to be esteeemed even among thieves. Its object is to attain that which is just and useful in the action of society. and springs not only from policy of the head, but from purity of the heart. It is not the act, but the intention that constitutes it; and has in prospect that which is equitable, and aims at all that is good in results. Its office is the same in every engagement, and meets its duties without effort or formality. It never asks what is expedient, but what is praiseworthy, and measures every performance by the dignity which it is becoming for it to maintain. It is a law unto itself; and whether in a public or private position, the individual who possesses it is ever actuated by an immutable principle, that indicates him to be the well-tred and re liatle gentleman. He stands the model of his place, and is not allured from his course by either facor or profit, but pursues his object with constancy and firmness. He always do clares bims It on the side of right, and looks for no other advan age than that which flows from the delight of conscious rectitule; for he always knows his outy, and allows neither inconvenience, nor f ar of consequences, to deter him from its p rformance. His portion i-finelity, and no partry plea of time-solving expediency, is suffered to delute his noble purposes. He never disappoints the just expectations of those who know him; and those who are familiar with his attributes, are aware, in anticipation, how he will act upon subjects that are placed under his control. His rule is to subdue the indecorous appeals of private interest, and devote his zeal to the promotion of public virtue and social happiness. His in tellect is unrainted by the frivolities of senseless pride, and his magnanimity is shown as readily towards his enemies, as his charity denutes piry for the unfortunate. His advice is rendered without uncouthness, and is generosity is evinced without vulgar parade. He possesses humility without cowardice, simplicity without baseness, and urbanity without condescention. He bears his virtues without affectation, and puts in force his power, without purile display. He has such a clear perception of rigut, that neither ridicule nor inconsistence attach to his name, and although his course may not always he considered expedient by the shortsighted, it is sure to be amply corrotorated by future developments, and those who before contemned his judgment, become the readiest to award commendation to his wisdom. Sinister motives have no connection with his transactions, and his brow does not undergo the various shades of light and shame that are manifested in the countenance of the dishonorable, when the voice of applause or reproach, is heard in praise or blame. Hon r is not the product of adventitious circumstances, but a combination of the best of human qualities, and the stamina of an uncorrupted mind. It is the acme of the whole man, and enables him to rank among the noblest of his clime. There is something so real about it that its sterling worth is everywhere respected, and without it, an individual is not only the veriest of blots, but occupies the lowest grade of moral inferiority. Its presence bespeaks an intellect above the guile of cupidity, and supe rior to the wiles of sordidness. It is guided by an unchanging integrity, and manifests itself with uniformity in properity or adversity. No rank or position alters it, and it is the stay of distinction and the germ of eminence. No freak of fortune, for weal or woe, causes the slightest deviation in its straight-forward career, and the truit of it, is all profit of the most valuable and durable character; for so sure is its guidance, and so unfailing is its reward, that the man of honorable ways has never yet known the want of a friend in the season of distress, or the as-istance of a strong hand in the time of misfortune; and he who expects that the wealth; the fame or position, which is acquired with out its power, will prove enjoyment, is more than self de eived by the insufficient estimate which he places upon the discernment of the world, and the workings of the laws which Heaven has spoken to direct mankind. Its prompting is the wooing of virtue; and it is refreshing to turn from an examination of the sickenslough into which ignorance, vice and folly plunge so many to the contemplation of the character of men of honorable worth. It is like removing from the sense of smell the most nauseous odors, and substituting those of grateful tragrance. The transition is like magic, and the upright heart bounds with joy to know that it can find a congenial spirit, whose every sentiment springs from a loftliness of soul that dis dains the petty artifice of life, and dwells in an a mosphere untainited by the impulses of either treachery of sensuality.
